POSITION PAPER for convention

ED. NOTE: The following article was written as a political position paper for the same Convention in August. It is the hope of the editor that more position papers will be written and sent to NLN for publication.

by Tom Condit

Carl Oglesby's "World revolution and American containment" speech raises a number of points I feel SDS members should give some thought to. Oglesby's support of anti-imperialist revolution in the "Third World" is clearly stated, but what little analysis appears in the speech is characteristic of some of the weaknesses of New left political thought.

"New Left Notes is hardly the place for a lengthy discussion of World War II resistance movements, but Oglesby's comments on them cast a good deal of light on his analysis of the world situation. "Europe was not revolutionary, Asia is," he says. "The resistance movements . . . gained their power most importantly because they were resistance, not because they sought a basic rearrangement of social power." This is simply not true. The largest and most effective resistance movements (e.g., Yugoslavia, Italy, Greece, the Phillipines) had a social as well as national program and were under socialist or communist leadership. It was this fact which made the Allies so anxious to immediately disband the movements as "liberated" areas. Without the collaboration of the Communist leaders this disbanding could never have been achieved. I assume that Oglesby is referring to this when he speaks of the "extraordinary power and irresistible Communist party" as a factor leading to the "non-revolutionary" character of the European situation.

Even if we accept the analysis of post-war Europe as "non-revolutionary", however, the differentiation becomes hard to sustain. What is the difference between national liberation (resistance) movement against foreign tyranny in Europe and one in Asia? Both take in all elements of the "middle" including only revolutionary (fascism) and comprador (quislings). Oglesby specifically gives a role in the revolution to "national industrial groups" (i.e., patriotic local capitalists like some of the Gaullist elements in World War II Europe), so the difference can't be one of friendliness or hostility toward capitalism. In fact, the only elements of the European resistance movement who are missing from the "third World" movements are the organized industrial workers. They have been replaced by revolutionary "intellectuals" who are "burning with shame" because of their country's backwardness, and also because of its inability to provide them with civil service jobs.

Leaving aside this interesting substitution for the moment, let's look at what our modern revolutionary movements do. Potential leftists will "break-up foreign-controlled monopolies, raise wages, redistribute land, and trade freely with all nations." Note that monopolies and land are "broken-up" and "redistributed" rather than nationalized or socialized, and that it is only "foreign-controlled" monopolies which are attacked.

This would consolidate the power of a national capitalist class by eliminating the competition of foreign capital, raise wages to provide a domestic consumer goods market, break the political power of the old-time lords, and satisfy the land-hunger of the peasants (thus creating the basis of the stable class supported by the bureaucracy for that democracy which we may or may not have – Oglesby is ambiguous). The "brazilian wage slave" referred to earlier in Oglesby's speech remains a wage slave, the peasant is directly impoverished by the market rather than indirectly thru his land-lord, and the economy remains securely within the world market (and that contributing profits to imperialism in a somewhat less direct manner). The only differences between this program and the "Alliance for Progress" are that Wall Street's share of the profits has been slightly reduced in favor of the national capitalist class, and that the Soviet Union has been cut in for a slice of the pie by "trading freely with

White Organizing And White Racism

The following memorandum was prepared for a conference of the Southern Student Organizing Committee, held in early June, 1966, in Asheville, N. C.

MEMO

TO: The Southern Student Organizing Committee

FROM: Anne Braden, editor, The Southern Patriot, associate executive director, Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF).

I am disturbed by some statements in your May newsletter – and also by a general line at thinking that seems prevalent in the movement now. Since you have no more issues of the newsletter this summer, I am jotting down a few notes this way now. In the fall, I would like to ask that you let me write an article for your newsletter setting forth a different view.

The line of thinking that disturbs me is that now that more Negroes in the movement are thinking in terms of 'black consciousness' etc, white people in the movement should "step aside" and begin organizing separately. I am all for the idea of white people trying to organize white people into movements for social justice. What I object to is the concept that they must be organized separately from Negroes.

One article in your May newsletter states in regard to the Southern Mountain Project that the commitment of this project to "integrated community organization" is an Achilles heel which fastedons the project to failure.

Now, the Southern Mountain Project may indeed fail. Any project may fail. There are many reasons other than its principle of integration that could lead to why it might fail. Even if it failed because of this that would be a principle we'd fail somewhere else.

How can anybody say at this point that the concept of integration is wrong? The past will fail in the South? How many times has it not been tried (in the current period)? How much effort has been put into trying it?

What bothers me if it is so is that people as young as you all are seem to be willing to write off something as impossible before it has really been tried. I do not think this is an attitude that one usually associates with youth.

Let me go back a minute and state what I think are some of my credentials for discussing this matter of black-white organizing. I am a white person who has been working for years that the job of white people should be to reach out to white people and help

SDS statement on SNCC

ED. NOTE: The following resolution on SNCC was passed by the NC.

SDS has long maintained fraternal relations with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Now that SNCC is under fire from a variety of liberal organizations and publications we feel a special urgency to restate our support. Let it be clear that we are not merely supporting SNCC's right to its views, we are welcoming and supporting the thrust of SNCC's program, and expect to continue our joint work.

SNCC has emphasized 'black power.' This is not a magic charm or a promised land; it is a strategy for social change and a mode of organization. Both the strategy and the mode become clear if the United States is understood as an essentially racist country. Yet at the same time Negroes have been an exploited caste, they have been taught to seek their salvation in integration — that is, in an accommodation to the dominant social values, under white leadership.

We know that not all SNCC's critics resemble George Wallace; they differ precisely why we try to lay bare the liberal assumptions that lead to attacks like Wallace's. We are struck with the fact that among the critics are liberals vociferous in their praise of an America in which minorities organize themselves and preserve their cultural integrity. They are now denouncing SNCC's 'black consciousness' as "racism in reverse." No doubt these critics would themselves be upset if SNCC sought to accept the major premises of American life; it is precisely because SNCC is revolutionary — because it is trying to bring about a fundamental rearrangement of power in America — that they shrink in horror.

Racism and economic exploitation confront Negroes as a group, together. So, of course, Negroes, especially in the Southern black belt and the Northern ghettoes, must act as a group in order to challenge that exploitation. This is not "racism in reverse" any more than American revolutionists are "Britishists in reverse." It is a recognition of the fact of common identity and the necessity of strategy for change. We must not simply tolerate the 'black consciousness,' we should encourage it.

Measured integration is very likely to be coerced, since integration assumes the integrity of the dominant (white) culture. "Black consciousness," on the other hand, understands very deeply the exploitativeness of that culture and seeks to make a beginning in reconstructing it. We agree, then, with SNCC in asking why Negroes cannot seek to live and rebuild where they wish, in their own schools, with their own economic base, without being dismissed as "racist."

Some liberal and radical critics argue that SNCC's strategy will be frustrated by the sheer fact that Negroes are a minority, even in large portions of the Deep South. To this we say that the responsibility for that frustration would lie with those whites who fail to build white movements that can at some point ally with the black movement for common goals. Whites in the civil rights movement have almost always been auxiliaries; and at the present stage they could easily frustrate the Negro movement unless they recognize the right and the need for black radicals to organize independent bases of power in Negro communities. Power means the ability to act autonomously; it is a truism that the power of allied communities is limited to the extent it depends directly on white help. (This is not the only factor to be considered when the white radical thinks about organizing Negroes, but we cannot dispute its importance.)

SDS seeks to call white critics to their true tasks, not to impugn their motives. If we really want to help we will be organizing primarily among the powerless, the disenfranchised, the dependent whites — poor, working class, and middle class — toward their power in communities, unions, and professions, so that they may move toward authentic alliance with the organizations of black power. There can be no true coalition for radical change unless both exist people, many spheres, wherever they are, committed to and organized for the destruction of American life.

Finally, SNCC has been criticized for having a position on the Vietnam war, in the first place; and second, for having the position it does. one of deep and wholehearted opposition. but we applaud SNCC for recognizing that the enemies of deep-seated social change at home are the enemies of revolution abroad, and for acting to forge alliances with the oppressed in the Third World. We are saddened to see prominent internationalists attacking SNCC for articulating its solidarity with their brothers — whether in Guatemala or South Africa or Vietnam — and we intend to work closely with them in making international contacts without sectarianism. We also without illusions as to the real position of America in the world, or for its own poor and powerless.

report from the draft workshop

General Orientation

The expanding war in Vietnam will necessitate increased student draft. To decide which students will go and while maintaining the 25 system, the government has initiated both the test and rank procedures. Drafting based on rank will necessarily lead to farce competition amongst students for grades. The continued existence of deferment creates the illusion that safety can be gained by getting good grades and high test scores. Grade competition and test illusion divide and isolate students.

We must fight to overcome the divisions by struggling for student unity. Such unity can lead to alliances with other sections of the population opposed to the war and/or struggling for social change.

While we must, obviously, oppose 25 as a divisive and class-racial-discriminatory system, we have to do this on the basis of collective struggle against the administration and the government, not by individual scrifice.

PROGRAM

We are trying to build a radical student movement. The program we use must be based on the requirements of that general perspective at this time. As we see it, the job we've got now is to move the students who are presently opposed to the war into activities on the question of the war as concretely expressed in the institutions in which they study/live/work. We must develop struggles by these students at the campuses against the school administrations for student self-determination and against the war.

This will mean broader base building. That is, we must take the anger that students feel against rank, 25, etc. and turn it into opposition to the administration and the war. The war has in fact created the situation in which students feel most about rank. The administrations have compounded this anger by rendering the students powerless. We must learn how to combine these struggles to build a student movement against the war and fighting for university control.

As a more long-term strategy, we have to begin carrying the struggle against the war as it affects people's daily lives into the communities, factories, etc. Students can help in this. At the moment many non-students have a very distorted view of our reasons for protesting the war in Vietnam. Often they feel that we don't want to go because we're cowards - that we want them to go in our place. Students, organized in opposition to draft and drafting procedures, in the context of opposition to the war, can be organized to go off campus, as students, to bring the issues of their protest to the poor, black people, white workers, etc. This, of course, is hard work if we are not organizing opposition to 25.

*DRAFT * 25 * RANK * GRADES*

Orientation – We must recognize ourselves, and struggle to overcome, students that the 25 system and all its supports (e.g. the card system, the SSAs tests, etc.) are not in their true interests. This system generally results in drafting them by high by dividing them from the rest of the population (the government can play off resentment against the Vietnam war against the students) and also by dividing them internally, giving some the illusion that they won't have to go. We must interconnect this struggle against 25 with struggle to the system is tied to the war and U.S. foreign policy in general, with the struggle for student control of the university.

*Demands Concerning War * Draft * 25 * Ranks* – We must demand and aid to the war in Vietnam by unconditional withdrawal of U.S. troops and other agencies, an end of the draft for Vietnam, an end to the 25 system and the dissolution of university cooperation with the Selective Service. Obviously, the university cannot itself end the war, abolish 25 or the draft - it can only stop cooperating with the military machine. It is essential, however, to raise these other issues for strategic reasons which flow from what has been said in an earlier section. While we cannot demand that the draft end, we can rank sit-down take a stand against the war, there are numerous possible tactics for conducting the anti-war anti-Selective Service anti-administration struggle, such as demands for a referendum on campuses to end ranking, sit-downs in testcenters, refusal by masses of students to begin final exams until schools agree not to rank, student strikes against teachers who send in grades, student struggle to get teachers to hand out written evaluations instead of grades, etc. The methods can vary from school to school.

UNIVERSITY CONTROL

Orientation – We are trying to relate the war and general foreign policy issues which have created the present student militancy to the question of student power. The war has intensified the contradiction between the students and the administration, as well as that between faculty and administration, although to a lesser degree.

Demands: These must vary. The crucial question here is to build student power against the administration on the basis of concrete issues important to our radical program. We must raise the question of 25,and the draft for Vietnam, we must take this stand ourselves. Aside from sit-downs power, then, in terms of, as it flows from, the struggles we are waging for an end to rank-test-25-draft and against the war. If the basis for university control is launched in terms of this real content, any victory in form will be worthwhile – even if it involves a defeat in terms of content. For example, if students at some campus were to demand a referendum on the question of rank and succeed, through student pressure, in the administration's getting that referendum, and then lose the referendum (i.e. rank would not have been at least defeat) Such struggle raises the consciousness of students around the war-draft issue, teaches them that they can struggle against the administration, shows them the necessity of demanding control of their lives, and establishes a highly useful precedent for future (higher-level) struggle around the question of university control.

all nations". Neither of these "deviations" is serious enough to necessarily preclude State Department part of an enlightened and long-range U.S. policy.

It may be difficult to locate enough members of "national industrial groups" to run the economy, and they may be reluctant to do so if it means that the predominance of "industrial groups" everywhere tend to shy away from activities involving large numbers of armed workers and/or peasants). In that case, and the planned economy will be taken over by our cadres of revolutionary students and intellectuals, who are learning with great zeal a desire to revolutionize the country (and providentially unemployed). The program will be carried out exactly as above except that now it will be called "socialism". In other cases, it will be necessary to occasionally arrest or shoot those disgruntled elements 'wage slaves' and inquisitive peasants for wanting to know who may endanger 'national unity' by feeling that all this hasn't improved their personal situation too radically. Depending upon which path has been chosen to carry out the program, these people can be easily labelled as agents of Russia, China, the CIA or all three.

Meanwhile, Oglesby proposes that the American left should move to support the "third World" revolutions by forcing the U.S. government to make all military intervention into the affairs of other nations, and to discourage the investment of private capital abroad by requiring corporations to pay U. S. wage rates in overseas operations and to keep all profits in the country of origin (with their use dictated by our non-interventionist government), and by guaranteeing all compensation in case of expropriation. Such alternative sources of capital (e.g., massive economic aid by the U. S. government or the U. N.) are proposed. The investment gap will be supposedly be filled by Great Britain, France, the Soviet-Union, Japan, etc. This should be of great value to "national industrial groups" as those countries are also underdeveloped, that Brazilians may not receive too many benefits from it.

If Oglesby's rhetoric of "world revolution" reduces itself to such non-revolutionary specifics as these, it becomes difficult to see more than a few basic faults in his approach. The first is that nations with such vast social and economic systems, and their effect on man's lives, cannot be changed overnight by abstractions. Thus the "world revolution" becomes not an international social revolution in a series of interlocking national movements' viewed as discrete phenomena in isolation from each other, but movements in the rest of the world. These movements are, consequently, seen as the political-military social arena known as the "third World". The second fault is a necessary corollary of the first, that the "long-range" proposed for the movement has no ties to any programs of domestic social change. It appears merely as a set of abstract demands hurled into an empty space by student demonstrations.

The term "third World" refers to those 75-100 countries which are exploited by the advanced industrial nations as sources of agricultural products, raw materials, and as markets for finished goods. Since the advanced industrial nations control the world market, they are able to set the prices of both manufactured goods and primary products (that is, products derived directly from nature by mining, forestry, fishing, agriculture, etc). These terms of trade have steadily altered in favor of the advanced nations. By 1957, the price-index of primary products had fallen to 92% of their 1951 average, while the index of manufactured goods had risen to 126% of the 1951 average.

This price decline masks a still more disastrous relative decline in the importance of primary product exports. World trade more than doubled between 1948 and 1959, but exports of primary products made up 33% and part of that rise was in exports from the developed countries (e.g., Canada and Australia, for instance, have totally wiped out all competition in the wheat market). Between 1950 and 1962, world exports rose by 7.1%, but those of Third World countries rose by only 3.4%. The rise in the use of synthetics, greater efficiency of design and production to reduce waste in manufacturing, and more advanced techniques of primary production have enabled the developed nations to produce a larger share of their own needs. Between 1955 and 1961 alone, this self-sufficiency in industrial products needs increased from 50% to 52% and is steadily rising.

An increase in primary production –pouring more raw materials into a declining world market – isn't provide a solution to the economic problems of the "third World". As noted above by international agreement to restrict production on items like coffee has proven itself rarely successful. So the only way out of the third's industrialization. Since no single country of the "third World" possesses the internal resources necessary for large-scale industrialization, the regional approach. What form of international cooperation can best create either the capital flow or the industrialization itself?

The official U. S. line on this question is a continuation of the 19th century "open door" policy of free trade. It rests on the argument that in a free world market, unrestricted by tariff barriers, both raw materials and manufactured goods will tend to arrive at their "fair" prices. Underdeveloped will stabilize at "real world demand", and capital will flow into those areas where it can most efficiently be put to use. Foreign aid and long-term credits from the advanced nations should be channeled preliminarily into development of "infrastructure" (dams, railroads and harbors, highways, etc) necessary to make private investment profitable. This "free trade area" should provide developregional barriers to trade but not set up universal tariff walls, and central planning should not be allowed to distrupt the "natural development" of markets and cause "irrational" production. Despite the internal opposition of protectionists and isolationists, the State Dept. has steadily pursued this basic liberal policy of lessening the tariff wall 100 years, and reducing down "artificial barriers to trade" with the marines where necessary.

Three obvious facts make it impossible for any government in the "third World" to come nearer to the "ideal" of this line than polite disbelief (although many collaborate with it in practice). The first is that of the 147.4 billion in foreign capital invested in "third World" countries between 1950 and 1961, 92% or billion went back to the advanced countries as profits and 113.2 billion was lost through deterioration in terms of trade. Second, the remaining 13.4 billion (about 20% of 1 year's) U.S. "defense" budget was mainly invested in the relatively declining extractive industries, since these offer quick profits. Third, to get it simply, the policy is not being and will not be carried out. Not only have foreign approaches by State Dept. planners cancelled the practice by the demands of special interests in the U.S. for tariffs and protection for their investments abroad. The absence of political and economic stability in the "third World" causes military considerations to be given total precedence in our foreign policy. Any drive towards "rational" change against U.S. power is sacrificed to a pervasive fear that any change may open the floodgates for all kinds of evils.

In Western Europe, particularly in Communist and social-democratic circles, a different approach is gaining support, one which is also supported by many liberal and moderate nationalist leaders in the underdeveloped nations. It proceeds from the assumption that industrialization of the "Third World" is an immediate economic necessity for the advanced nations. As the relative prices of raw materials decline on the world market, so does the ability of the "Third World" to purchase manufactured goods. This creates the same type of crisis of consumption for the developed countries which could be caused by internal poverty and unemployment. Also no considerable increase in the volume or price of primary products can offset this difficulty. Military power, the principles of the "welfare state" must be extended to the world economy and vigorous steps taken to stimulate industrialization of the "Third World" as part of a realistic division of labor in world production.

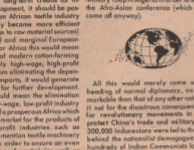
As an example, if sufficient capital was supplemented by long-term credits for infrastructure development, it should be possible to develop a South African textile industry which could easily become more efficient given the economies in raw material transport than the backward and marginal European textile industry. For Africa this would mean the development of modern cotton-farming and of a relatively high-wage, high-profit industry. Aside from eliminating the dependence on textile imports, it would generate additional capital for further development. For Europe, it would mean the elimination of a relatively inefficient and marginal industry and the creation of a prosperous African which would be a ready market for the products of high-wage, high-profit industries such as electronics (not to mention textile machinery manufacturing). In order to ensure an orderly flow and allocation of capital (as well as to ease the pains of transition) it would be necessary to have centralized national and supranational planning. This is unthinkable in Africa, but this is entirely compatible with the domestic social goals of this position's advocates.

The advocates of the above position vary widely in their views of the role of the state, of public vs. private capital, how far industrialization of the "Third World" should go, national planning should go, etc. they are united in their view of the necessity for some type of planned industrialization, and in their belief that this can be peacefully accomplished by the extension of "welfare state" methods. I think the first point is demonstrably false, and that the second is most partially depend upon our position in regard to the "welfare state" itself — whether we think its ever-rising problems of industrial society, and whether we would consider such a solution adequate in terms of our own human and social goals.

The second, if not the most consistent opponents of the "social-democratic" position, are the Chinese. They maintain that the capitalists of the underdeveloped nations are the natural allies of the "social democrats" position, are the Chinese. They maintain that the capitalists of the underdeveloped nations are the natural allies of the working class in the struggle against imperialism. At this point, the Chinese are willing to support any "liberal" nationalist regime which is opposed to the interests of industrialists in the Upper Volta than they have in supporting the "left" wing of Maoist-ist Negroes. All their pretensions of daring to act primarily at the level of opposition or at co-opting into a essentially capitalist planning structure in which the workers have been co-opted into the welfare state. The "Third World" countries should choose this revolutionary course, decisively break with the capitalist nations, and rely primarily on their own resources and on mutual trade to build an industrial base. This "international" verbiage masks an essentially nationalist and reactionary basis on Stalin's "socialism in one country" policy of pulling yourself up by your own bootstraps. After 50 years of this policy, accompanied by brutal labor, brutal collectivization of agriculture and totalitarianization of every aspect of life, the Soviet Union, despite its vast industrial resources, remains one of the most backward of the industrialized countries. China began the same process 20 years later, with an industrial base far more backward than that of the Russia. The presence of internal accumulation inexplicable can bridge this gap, and until it does the regime can sustain the small progress being made.

The aim of Chinese policy is therefore twofold: to secure external military and trade alliances while increasing the internal cohesion and efficiency of the regime. The theoretical basis of this policy is the doctrine of international class struggle between the rich, "bourgois" nations and the poor, "proletarian" nations. By reducing the social and economic problems at the "Third World" to those of nationalist conflict with imperialism, it is possible for the Maoists to create a "Marxism" which places reactionaries of all stripes within the "proletarian" camp so long as they are "anti-imperialist". Central to the policy is the doctrine of encirclement and starvation of the world's "cities" (advanced industrial areas) by peasant revolutions which will choke off their supplies of food and raw materials.

Therefore, this means that the Chinese can ally themselves to governments of many types, ranging from fascist states to democracies of nations to other nations as more important than the internal social relations of the nations. Thus, China has set forth "mutual friendship" with the military dictatorship of Pakistan and seeks agreement with the "progressive" feudalists of Nepal, Albania and Rumania, as well as with the merchants of Manila and the bankers of Singapore — all in the interest of "socialist revolution" and also of China's foreign trade. The result of this opportunistic policy was the Indonesian recognition of Soumedjanova's military coup in Algeria in order to sabotage the Afro-Asian conference (which failed to come off anyway).



All this would merely come under the heading of "realpolitik" were it not more reprehensible than that of any other nation, were it not for the disastrous consequences for the revolutionary movement in Asia. To protect China's trade and military interest, 300,000 Indonesian peasants, the vast deaths behind the nationalist demagogue Sukarno, established a military Communist Party in Java, and the Japan Communist Party ongoing denounces "revisionism" (support for the bourgeois for alienating members of the "patriotic bourgeoisie" by attacking Japanese imperialism. The Chinese have sacrificed the benefit of the uninitiated, are Japanese proletarians to the needs of their foreign trade.

For American radicals, following the "China" line is the worst possible error. Since Maoism effectively writes off all possibility of revolutionary development in the industrial "cities" of the world, the role of American "revolutionaries" is restricted to harassing in the form of the Progressive Labor "building cadres" to await the day when American capitalism collapses from its imperialist programs. As isolated outposts of the world revolution, they are not distinct, but are tied up until relief comes. At the same time, their energies must be devoted to support of the main struggle, the encirclement against the war in Vietnam (for example) and sharply criticizing any other dissident social issues.

Since the doctrine of "victory from without" allows "revolutionaries" to identify with a world movement while relieving them of any responsibility for revolutionary activities at home, it has a certain attraction for middle-class radicals. In fact, since the Chinese apparently support the view (in fact is its mainstay) that the underdeveloped reactionary character of the metropolitan areas) that the welfare state can effectively solved the internal problems of capitalism, it's possible to be both a Maoist and a welfare-state liberal. Thus, the combination of guerrilla movements abroad and reform domestically is possible. It's also possible for the Chinese in supporting every "nationalist" movement in the world, to do so in a highly unethical way, which saves the painful bother of trying to find out what's going on. For example, the Indonesian Communist Party (as China [and I would include those SDS members who are also members of Progressive Labor in this number] the problem is one of reconciling the "Marxist" revolutionary line of the Chinese with their own desire for a consistent and principled world view. Thus, Progressive Labor has been constructing up against is a confusion between "nationalist" and "socialist" forces in the world. Because serious policy toward the "Third World", we must stop confusing the nationalist bourgeois with those of individuals, try to pick out the actual problems of the "Third World" and decide what we want to do about them. It would be well to bear in mind that the nationalist bourgeois are primarily not likely to maintain their dominance for some time to come, and that they have little responsibility for progress or retrition throughout the world rests most heavily on our shoulders. The question that we want the most urgent is: the people of the "Third World" that we want for ourselves: food, clothing, shelter and medical care; decent working conditions, leisure, literacy, and the opportunity of every man to share the fruits of his own culture and others as well as the fruits of production; and the human dignity which comes only with individual and social freedom, and which can be assumed only by possession of democratic institutions thru which men can control the conditions of their own lives. True freedom cannot come as a gift of rulers or bureaucrats, however paternalistic or all-wise they may be.

We know two things about these goals. The first is that they cannot be accomplished from one another or from democracy; the second is that they cannot be by the "bourgeois" the poor man is robbed of education and medical care; the grossest poverty and misery of even his own culture. The second is that these are benefits which accrue to men and women rather than to nations, we cannot ensure food and clothing for "Brazil", only for Brazilians. When someone speaks of "national goals" or "national grievances", we have a right to ask just what he means. Usually, has these goals, feels these grievances.

Perhaps, in fact, we should challenge the existence of the whole concept of nationalism. The major political problems today are economic and political questions which cut across national and pseudo-national boundaries, and readily translate into conflict between them. If we are to look for units larger than the individual that confront and understand the needs of the 3 billion members of our race, and upon which to found movements for social change, then it will not be nationalists, but social classes. Vernacularize revolutionaries have proven themselves in Congolese truck drivers, and Mexican peasants, but not their politicians or government officials.

Similarly, American bankers and industrialists have more in common with their counterparts in the "Third World" than with their automakers or Mississippi sharecroppers. The difference is that the bankers and industrialists are aware of their international interest, and have a dynamic and foreign policy to match it. Our position is to counter this policy with one based on the economic interests of the exploited and exploited. In order to do this, we must come to a rough understanding of who the victims of our society are, and how they can be victimized.

We see the phrase "our society" because we see no me that the problems of Brazilians and Americans are not distinct, but are matters of differing relations to a common system of exploitation. In that sense, the term "Third World" is meaningless. If a Latin American peasant is robbed of the fruits of his labor by the Mexican landlord or exploitation, it is so that worthy may purchase a Cadillac, or that stock may rise on the market for General Electric. Only in a few areas of subsistence agriculture are there social systems having no existence independent of the world market. Imperialism is not an independent phenomenon, but an integral part of capitalism, the dominant system of production in the world today.

The first essential feature of capitalism is production for profit, rather than for use, and for unrealized use. Even in areas where most people grow food for local use (as in most of the "Third World"), the production which goes to the market is the decisive one. It is the one which determines what kind of clothing people will have, whether their children will be educated, how much of the burden of their labor will be lifted by modern tools and machinery. Moreover, this decisive part of production is organized not on the basis of tenant farming or feudal relations, but on the basis of large-scale plantation agriculture or mining, organized along the same lines as in any factory. The slogan "redistribution of the land" is either irrelevant or reactionary in relation to this type of production. Moreover, this production for the market brings an increasing interdependence of areas which were formerly outside the American economies on Bolivian tin and Malayan rubber, to American manufacturers, which renders all "national" solutions to economic problems impossible.

The second essential feature of the system is the division of power within the production process, a division which determines the nature of all other social institutions. On the one hand, we have those who own, who control, direct and issue orders, who to one degree or another exercise power as a "right" which is the product of property. On the other hand, we have those who are in the position of executors of decisions they did not make, and who have only such power as they are able to take thru collective organization. This principle of hierarchy and subordination, entrenched as "necessary" in industry, carries over as a part of all social organization. If men spend half their working day in an authoritarian environment, they can hardly be expected to wish all the job and become responsible citizens of a democracy. If "managers" and "workers" are to be essential at the heart of a society, they come to be seen as essential elsewhere as well.

This means that economic and social struggles indirectly relate to the nature of the state apparatus. Any challenge to the right of the ruling class to rule anywhere is seen by the ruling class as a challenge to their rule where it counts — in industry. This explained guerilla movements in Colombia or elsewhere, and the refusal of workers' institution in Newark are both indirectly demands for the end of hierarchy in industry as for as the establishment is concerned. Once the principle of hierarchy is successfully challenged in one sphere, it is endangered in all others. Every social or political group becomes more or less a class struggle, depending upon the extent to which the participants are aware of the implications of their activity.

I use the word "class" in a very old-fashioned way, as related directly to men's relationships to their work. Thus, it is one thing for a machine to operate its own, directs or profits from, and to another it is something which dominates his life, to which he is subordinated. Marx, who is seen in the order of things as being actually revolutionary than he was, thought, is then the relationship of those two men to one another can be summarized in the relation to the machine. Nothing that happens off the job, no question of income or "status", is important in determining their lives and consciousnesses as that relationship. Rather than defining "class" in terms of relations of production determine questions of income and "status". The more "class" the machine determines the division of its profits, and the man who is subordinated to it's machine he is to be "lower" in class. For example, a machine operator who makes 93 per hour is "lower class" than a skilled craftsman who makes 91 per hour, but he is like a shopkeeper whose income is the same as his. Machine operators belong to one social class, and shopkeepers to another.

To the extent that those who are dominated by the "social" in social relations are aware of their real situation and common interests, to that extent their fear are not as ignorant and powerless as they had been led to believe. As the system of exploitation and subjugation bases, votes for candidates they had no part in selecting, etc.), they discover that their real power is precisely where the real power of their opponents has its roots — in industry. The "better" elective power, prestige and income from the control of a political "boss" has its roots down, the challenge to work rules, are actions which challenge the whole chain of power in our society.

Thus, the Asian peasant and the American auto worker have approximately the same enemies, and if they struggle against them they will accomplish the same things (which might be summarized as liberty, equality and fraternity), our problem becomes to eliminate the false barriers between them, to help them realize their real interests, to invest so that they may join their strengths.

At this point, many readers will already be saying that SDS has a reformist view in SDS is that the organized working class, both here and in the "Third World", has been bought off with a bigger share of the profits of exploitation, and has become a part of the "middle class" and thence (by some form of osmosis) of the "Establishment". We are only potentially revolutionary, and that only in society are those who remain both segregated and powerless — the peasants of the "Third World", the negroes and urban poor of the developed countries, and (again by some form of osmosis) students and intellectuals. This ignores two salient facts about wage workers.

The first is that they have a huge potential power. This is far more than workers can ever more (rather than less) exploited than the poor, since the value of the product which is alienated from them is greater. Therefore, them find their way into social movements that are pointed to the future and not the past. I have never seen this concept of white people floating into black communities and organizing them. I say never – that's a slight exaggeration, but anyway not for a long time. When I first got involved in the civil rights movement almost 20 years ago I certainly went through this stage, which I think most white people do, of working mainly in the Negro community. But soon after that I went through a period of fire on the one end and come to the realization that Negroes did not need me or want me to go and work them or organize them. I came to this realization through some things that happened to me, which I won't go into here because they are not pertinent now. But I made up my mind then, as many of you are making up your minds now I think, that if I really believed the things I said I did my job was to reach the white people of my community – and wherever else I could reach them – and convince them of the evils of racism and of the meaning of real democracy.

As the new movement developed in the South in the late 1950's and the early 1960's, there was a growing tendency for the relatively few white people who were active to work in the Negro communities. I just never could see this. When SNCC started as an almost entirely Negro student organization, I felt that my job as a white person was to convey to the white students of the South a feeling of what was really going on and how they could relate to it. It was for this reason that SCEF started the 'white student project' of SNCC, under which we made a grant to SNCC for the employment of someone to reach white students.

But at that stage, it was very hard to convince the white people who were active that this was their job. There was a great temptation to be where the action was, and the action was in the Negro communities.

Then, by the summer of 1964, white students (mostly from the North, but some Southerners) were coming into the South in great numbers, as you all know. Mostly they were going to the black communities.

At that point, I greatly welcomed and agreed with the SSOC project which was going to attempt to reach the white people of Mississippi. I know some of the problems of that project and that it was not the greatest success in the world. But I thought your idea was right, and I truly think it might have been different if there had been more than just the feeble handful of you interested in it. People say the revolution in Mississippi cannot be reached – but how do we know? Suppose all of the human energy that has been poured by the movement into reaching Negro Mississippians had been put into reaching Mississippi whites? Where would have happened? We'll never know.

But at that point I had a full time job that was running against this sort of idea – and frankly at times I began to wonder if I was wrong. Surely everyone else in the world can't all step but me (and a few others), I thought.

Now, the pendulum has begun to swing the other way, and more and more white people are deciding they must reach out to white Southerner, especially the poor one, who by and large has been neglected by the movement and by society.

I am glad they are deciding this.

What I disagree with is the concept that they will organize these poor white Southerners separately apart from the Negro movement – and figure that somewhere down the road, maybe several years hence, maybe they'll get together in some sort of coalition.

I don't think it can work that way.

I think some people's conclusion that it can stems from their applying in their thinking about white communities some of the principles that are emerging from organization in the black communities. And I think this projection leads to a mistaken course.

To be specific: I can see the reasons (or think I can see them) why many Negroes are moving toward the idea of black organization. I know the reasons it is said that a "black consciousness" is needed. You all know this discussion. I won't go into it here. I think a great deal of it is valid. Therefore, I can see why Negroes want to build organizations of black people and build their consciousness as a people.

I just don't think the same arguments apply in organization of white people. For historic reasons, we may need "black consciousness." The last thing in the world we need is "white consciousness." As a matter of fact, of course, we already have 'white consciousness," with all the evil and destruction that indicates. What we need to do is tear it down.

Again to be specific, if you are going to engage in a project (and of course) to organize poor white people, I can see how it might be desirable that it may happen-whether you think it is desirable or not for the time being – as a separate project. But I can't see how it can be a part of the Negro movement. I can't see how it can be for a good purpose – to throw off oppression. I think that are the oppressor group. This is true even if they are on the low rungs of the ladder. They can organize to throw off economic oppression, and that's good, but at the same time they are members of an oppressed group economically they are still very much a part of the white oppressor white group – and when they are organized as white people the groups they form may very well become expressions of that oppression (as well as maybe expressions of their own fight against economic oppression).

To put it bluntly, these groups you have could well – and not too far in the future – become active anti-Negro groups.

This could happen regardless of the fact that you don't want it to happen, which of course you don't. But you are not going to control what your organize. As I understand your philosophy, you don't want to control your organizations. And you couldn't control it even if you wanted to.

As I understand it, Saul Alinsky had this experience in Chicago. He organized Negroes on the Southside – and he organized the Back-Of-The-Yards movement, which was all white and poor and very oppressed. The Back-Of-The-Yards movement became very strong and effective in fighting its own oppression – but later it was the backbone of a movement to keep Negroes out of that part of Chicago.

Maybe this could not have been avoided. What I am saying is that we need to try to avoid such mistakes by beginning in the very beginning to try to convince white people that their interest lies in teaming up with Negroes – even if the Negroes want and are forming their own organization. And if we hope to convince them, we must confront them with the issue as we see it – because it will get harder as people get more organized, stronger in their own organization, more entrenched, etc.

Let me give you an example. You mentioned somewhere (maybe the newsletter) that SSOC was considering "white community projects' in several cities, one of which was Louisville. Now Louisville is a city I know like the palm of my hand. I think a SSOC project there would be one of the most action would be a great thing for this city. But I can tell you right now that the last thing in the world we need in Louisville is a project that would come in and organize poor whites separate from Negroes. Let me be even more specific. If you were going to organize whites here, one natural place to begin would be a section of Louisville's West End known as Portland. It is almost all-white and poor. If you followed this "separate" idea you would go there with just white organizers, live, and organize the people around their grievances which are very real. You could do the-but if you did it that way I think it would be damaging to Louisville. As you helped these people gain added strength through organization, it is very likely that they would become more and more the rivals and antagonists (for public funds, power, etc.) of a well-organized group of Negroes in another part of the West End-Southside. As this happened, the people in Southwick would become more and more bitter toward the white people in Portland, and those in Portland more and more bitter against those in Southwick. It would be a vicious circle that would continue to get worse. Such antagonism already exists in embryonic stage; organizing Portland alone would intensify it. Any talk of getting them together somewhere down the road-is nonsense, in my opinion. It would further harden each such passing day.

On the other hand, some real good could be done if you or someone with your commitments came in here and began to organize the people in Portland with the specific and immediate goal of tying them in with the people of Southwick on their common crises and on common problems (and the problems in the two areas are very similar in many ways) right NOW. Not tomorrow but now.

It would not be easy. But I think there is a good chance it could be done.

I cannot believe that what is true in Louisville does not have counterparts in many other Southern cities. And believe me, Louisville is a Southern city. Don't let anyone tell you it is not.

It may be that the prophets of doom are right when they say it is impossible to bring the poor Southern white man into unity with the poor Southern Negro. It has not failed in the past when it was tried. I happen to think there are circumstances today that may make it different, circumstances that I go into here but which I touched on a bit in my article in Southern Exposure last winter. But I may be completely wrong. Maybe it is not possible.

But I say let's don't give up before we have tried. Let's try for it. Maybe pouring as much energy into that efforts white we have poured into Negro communities in recent years-and see what happens.

As for our Southern Mountain Project in Tennessee, as I said earlier, I'm not sure. But this is just one effort. I think there are possibilities there-but it is too soon to say for sure. But one thing I do feel: I do not think the handful of people working on that project should have to feel that the whole burden of proving whether white black organizing can be done is their's. I feel keenly their shoulders. If the project fails, it may fail for many reasons and we should not be burdened with feeling they must be the testing lab for an entire movement that includes many, many people.

I want to see some of the rest of you tackle this problem. Let's have many projects and many efforts. If we do that for a while, we'll have a better basis for any conclusions on it. And if we fail, we will know that it was not because we did not try. I think we who are white have this historic responsibility at this time-and I think the responsibility rests on the shoulders of each of us.

if you aren't paid up, pay your dues now!

Position Paper for Convention...concluded

their attempts to end or ameliorate their condition are far more dangerous in terms of potential profits and power lost to the ruling class. More important, however, is that workers are where they are by virtue of the heart of industrial society. If the poor of Chicago decide to reject the present welfare system and refuse to live by social workers, they can be ignored. If the workers of Chicago decide to take a strike and refuse to talk to the bosses, the life of the city comes to a halt and the bosses must come to terms. It's that simple.

The second fact about workers is that within the limits of the system, they cannot be permanently "bought off". A certain amount of yielding is possible (a little more here—as good; an things like wages, pensions, etc. The more job security clause in which each can have for his share. The system itself, however, depends upon the maintenance of authority and the "prerogatives of management' in industry. Where the rulers cannot yield is in any question of democracy and human dignity within industry, and they are continually challenged in this area.

In 1964 the latest year for which I have statistics) there were nearly 23 million man-days lost in strikes in America. Of these, less than 11 million were in strikes concerning "economic" issues (wages, hours, fringe benefits, etc.) and more than half (12 million) were in strikes over plant administration, job security, union organization, working conditions, etc., questions of power and of the control of men over the conditions of their own lives. Moreover, these statistics include only strikes lasting more than a full day, and thus exclude a large number of short wildcats. Finally, they do not include, almost all of which were over plant administration and job conditions.

This is not to suggest that there is going to be a revolution in America tomorrow, or that workers are totally unconcerned with paychecks. It is to say that workers have a very real desire for freedom and dignity as human beings, and to obtain it they must challenge the power of management and owners – a challenge which is being made daily in factories and offices all over the country (and the world). I would also suggest that one of the reasons for the SDS's failure to grow is its inability to grasp this fact. As long as radicals offered programs based on the "economic" issues which capitalism managed to meet (however inadequately), or on occasional crises which offered neither greater freedom for the common man nor any real opportunity for power, they were doomed to failure. Only by directly attacking the roots of alienation and dehumanization, by politicizing democracy within industry itself, is it possible for radicals to begin building an effective majority movement for the democratization of American society.

(The extent to which we can advocate the decentralization of industry depends, of course, on the extent to which we think it is think that the majority of the vast army of managers, supervisors, foremen, etc., are totally expendable in the industrial system. Their function is that of police – not to direct traffic, but to maintain the status-quo control. Decision-making and government of industry by elected representatives at mass meetings is not only possible but would probably be much more efficient.)

The third fact is that there is such a movement by just talking about it, or wishing for it. Organization is the only way to build a mass radicalization in industry before attempting to challenge the power and ruling class in America. We must act and fight wherever we are now, whether they exist right or not. Only in the organization of democratic counter-institutions among the poor, in factories and in university administrators. Those actions will become more meaningful if they are coordinated and if we see them as tied to a not-so-long-range goal of carrying the fight into the enemy's home ground in the factories. They will also become more meaningful if we differentiate between those actions and reformist rallies and those who are not. Although the majority of our present membership is made up of students, the majority of students will probably always remain hostile to basic change in America. For that we have exactly true of faculty and university employees. Similarly, if we seek in the long run to challenge the principle of hierarchy in industry, then we must realize that one of the places that challenge begins is an attack on bureaucracy in the unions. Since that won't win us any friends at Solidarity House, we'd better forget about building any coalitions from above, or else forget about democratizing the society, one or the other. It's necessary to build a coalition movement of labor, miserables and the urban poor in order to break the power of the American ruling class, but that has to be in real coalition of workers, negroes, Mexican-speaking people, etc., rather than a paper alliance of "leaders" of the various groups.

If minorities and the poor in Americacan't wait for a mass social movement to begin pressing their demands, neither can white workers and peasants of the "Third World". For them, however, it's necessary to take a much more radical position at the outset in order to accomplish anything at all. The peasants of a nation like Brazil are scattered, ignorant. Any sort of day-to-day discussion or a democratic decision-making in any large numbers of them is nearly impossible. Their knowledge of the outside world comes from the radio, from newspapers, and from an occasional movie or appearance by a traveling band. They thus inevitably come to accept the leader ship of one urban group or another, and what groups they join depends on whether peasant movements are progressive or reactionary.

The "national industrial groups" will, when push comes to shove, take their stand with "their" workers" in order to preserve their own. Students and intellectuals frequently take highly reactionary positions because for these flow from their heads rather than the conditions of their lives, it's impossible to predict which way they'll jump next, which makes them extremely unreliable allies – aside from the fact that intellectuals are probably the world's most easily "bought" social group.

That leaves the urban workers. In Brazil alone we've been using it for some time now all along) there are 1 1/2 million factory workers. Together with their wives and families, and allied workers in transport mining, plantations, etc, they make up a substantial majority, but still a minority, of more than 70 million people. Where they differ from other minorities is in three respects. First, they are concentrated in the large cities, where they are capable of exercising a working majority – therefore they have potential power, actual or potential. Second, because they are thrown together in large groups, (even in the plantations of the countryside) they are able to engage in discussion and come to common decisions on a day to day basis. Thus they are the only class in Brazilian society capable of ruling or even an internally democratic basis. Third, because of the nature of their work and their environment, they are literate and in contact with the world outside Brazil. This means that they are capable of carrying out a national policy based on Brazil's real situation in the world, rather than on ignorance or wish-fulfillment.

But no one takes hold of power merely to keep it in trust for someone else. If the workers take over Brazil, even with the greatest desire by workers' councils for large-controlled monopolies, raise wages, redistribute land and make other such all-national the very situation the nationalist capitalists in Brazil fear will immediately be being. Once they have the power, they mustneither relinquish it to others, who might then proceed to use it against them, or use it in their own interest – by, for instance, concentrating industry. Once that happens, no more compromises are possible. The "national industrial group" and the military go into armed opposition, and the Americans and other Latin American ruling classes immediately try to isolate and destroy the Brazilian revolution. All the myths about national liberation, "self-determination", etc, are forgotten by the oppressors. They must likewise be forgotten by the revolutionaries, who have no alternative but to attempt at spread their revolution to as many neighboring countries as possible as possible. Isolation means stagnation, disintegration and eventual defeat.

If the immediate goal has to be revolution at the seat of power, then defeat is still inevitable unless the revolution also spreads to North America. The economic problems of development and integration of the world market must inevitably deform the initially weak, if only a single nation or even region. The resources of the advanced nations must be put at the full disposal of the "Third World", and only a workers' revolution, operating under the necessity of avoiding a "World" from the underdeveloped world, would have the power or motivation to do so.

So this would be a call for immediate and full scale social revolution, I'll class. All this has been necessarily highly schematic and dogmatic, and the absence of previous discussion of this nature has led me to try to put too much into one article. I hope that at least much into one article. I hope that points I've raised will generate some more thoughtful discussion.

To Expedite N.C.'s

Chicago, Ill.

Like many others, I have been doing a lot of thinking lately about the way that the recent National Council meeting. My analysis is in the form of a list of the individual agenda ire the tendency to continually readjust the original concept of many of long-ups. Of course, many problems of length could be overcome if delegates began to take their responsibilities seriously and return promptly after meal or overnight adjournments at this point, however, I don't see how to implement this sort of orientation. But the fact that three days, or thereabouts are set aside for plenary sessions leads individuals to leave most of the thinking and all of the formal preparation on matters to the plenary, and allows all sorts of unessential things to be brought into the hopper. The possibility of talking, discussing, relaxed by analyzing the possibilities for various types of action are eliminated by the form as a long agenda. My suggestion is that, as in the long-ago past (I am told, national council meetings be preceded by a couple of days of work in small committee meetings that would formulate coalition proposals and present them to the plenary. Discussions on virtues of ideas and actions in less hectic and more participant-oriented contexts (delegates could skip committee meetings they weren't interested in, while that doesn't happen on floor debate) would provide the deep analyses SDS needs, (2) effect a more coherent distribution of power (with consensus resolutions), (3) eliminate much of the need for procedural hang-ups resulting from committee, talking until further study or until more delegates are present, formulation of the statement of resolutions, ordering and reordering the agenda without knowing what is going to be presented under each topic, etc.), and (4) minimize the prompting of members by silent-eating the need for over-night recesses.

Given the growing size of the organization, and the growing severity of the opinions in the group, we have to avoid the urge to feel compelled to spend days in formal debate and instead try to spend time seriously discussing our differences, limiting NC business to items that really have to be formally passed by that body and increasing the amount of informal substructure in the national organization. The most difficult and important business of NC, should, in the future, be done before the NC ever convenes perhaps then we shall maintain our sanity as well as our solidarity.

by Jerry Paul Simpson

This shall be a slanted argument.

The recent Democratic primaries in Oregon were a test between Wayne Morgan and Morgan and Charles Porter and "hawks" (Robert Duncan and William Yeo). Morgan lost, and badly. Porter won, barely. One up, one down. Nothing has changed. But whether these liberal Democrats won or lost should not have concerned leftists.

MORGAN

Morgan, running against Duncan for Democratic nomination for Senator, gave a prepared speech on Foreign Policy to Hull here in Eugene on April 23rd. It was the same speech he gave at almost everymore. Let's consider that speech.

Morgan laid into the personalities of Rusk and McNamara, said they were incompetent advisers to the President, and left them romantic. Sounds good on the surface. But notice did he question the system that makes the Rusks and McNamaras mere or less unavoidable. The whole point was blown. If the problems of Vietnam were somehow dependent upon Rusk and McNamara (both of whom are appointed by Mr. Party's fellow flaming liberal, John F. Kennedy).

What would Howard Morgan do to stop the war? His proposal included all the usual moderate points: a cease-fire (how it would be arranged he didn't say), negotiations directly with the V.C., coalition government, free elections supervised by outside powers, etc., and last, but by no means least, the puttanesi withdrawal of American troops. It seemed to me that this whole process would drag on for as long as three to five years and might never succeed anyway. Meanwhile, what are those troops going to do? Playbirds-and-seek in the Mekong Delta maybe? Also known as "pacification"-like, "painting free elections." Except for the point about negotiations, I'm with the V.C. Morgan's proposal was identical to L.B.J.'s propaganda.

We should also consider whether this proposal would be acceptable to the Vietnamese. Surely we have been unpopular in the West in those "negotiations" first by the French and then by the U.S. Government. Morgan's plan would allow the West even another chance. The issue is not negotiations -the issue is withdrawal, and negotiations are purely a technicality. Any solution to Vietnam must still include withdrawal as proof for the Vietnamese as to U.S. intentions.

Nevertheless, Morgan's speech sounded good. The audience felt that there was hope for peace in the Democrats, and they rallied him with so much integrity that they entirely missed the inconsistencies, particularly the implications of his replies to questions.

Someone asked him what he would do about the C.I.A. He said that he would join with those other Senators who are trying to bring the C.I.A. into the U.S. Government. In other words, he would do nothing about the C.I.A. The audience's response was ooh, aaah, wow...

Someone asked his opinion of the Domino theory, and as a liberal Democrat he of course had to take with it, more or less said it was haywash. The Dominos can go either way, he said, and then he summed up by painting to the results of the recent anti-Communist bloodbath in Indonesia: "Not bad, not bad, not bad..." An approving sound arose from the audience. See? A safe slaughter of commies is okay--we did it-but killing commie gooks in Vietnam is bad because we might get our race kidded in a war with China. So Howard Morgan is for peace in Vietnam, but Vietnamese? Ah, the mind reels at this man's integrity.

When he was asked about the draft, he referred to it as a past, his political career a few years ago when he went on record for its elimination. At that time, he said, it looked like we could do away with the draft, but now "because of Vietnam" we are entering a "dangerous period" and will "need" the draft. Mr. Morgan apparently contemplates further American interventions, and large ones, in places safer than Vietnam.

Morgan says that Vietnam is "the wrong war at the wrong time in the wrong place against the wrong enemy." Presumably then there is a "right" war--not just that some wars are right, but that there is a right war for us in the foreseeable future--maybe in the Andes? So, out of Vietnam and into Latin America... If you think my interpretation of Morgan is too cynical, consider this. On the two occasions that I have heard Morgan refer to the American left, he has knowingly and ostentatiously separated us far his own political gain. The first time was when he spoke before A.R.F.F.P. at the University last Fall Term. At that time he said our movement is composed of people who are opposed to all wars of any kind. Five years ago, this description of the peace movement would have been at least partly accurate. The old peace movement of the fifties was largely pacifist-liberal and pacifist in its perspective. Today's peace movement is largely anti-imperialist and political in its perspective, and Morgan knows this quite well. The second time was when he spoke at Harris Hall, April 23. He acknowledged us only as "adolescent demonstrators." Howard Morgan is no fool. He didn't make a mistake" when he used these smears against the left. He knew what he wanted to say to some of his supporters don't know.

PORTER

Charles Porter presents similar discomfort for leftists. "Charlie" ran in the Democratic primary for the Fourth Congressional district against "hawk" William Yeo and candidate Wayne Kennedy.

Porter spoke at the University on April 26, and during the question period I asked him: "If Senators Morse and Gruening are so principled as you say, then isn't support for Morse's support of the overthrow of Goulart in Brazil and Gruening's support of American aggression against the Dominican Republic? His answers were nebulous. He apparently couldn't account for it, or didn't want to.

Charles represents the left-wing fringe of the liberal establishment. On the one hand, Charlie says we live in a free and democratic society. On the other hand, he says it's hard to get elected without money. He doesn't see that the two factors contradict each other. In politics he is a basic minded liberal.

Mr. Porter notes that even hard liners on Vietnam like Senator Russell say we should get out of Vietnam if the Vietnamese don't want us. (Russell's remark was made during the April riots in Vietnam against the Saigon government.) Charlie says that if even dissenter has judgement on his specific issues. If his support of Duncan were truly "realpolitik", then his interest is first with the Democratic Party--other things like Vietnam are secondary. In that case, he is undependable and useless. And when Morgan lost to Duncan a few weeks ago, he said he still might support him against Hatfield. (The results of the Porter and Morgan vs. the Oregon Democratic pro-war resolution in Medford on March 27 was to say that it was a "reasonable and responsible" statement. And now Porter again says (June 1) he will support Duncan. This is the essence of "hawks" and "doves"!

Women peace pickets march through the Hyde Park community of Chicago on their way to U. S. 5th Army headquarters, where they conducted a brief demonstration. June 19. Some 200 mothers, young women and youngsters took part in the walk. (Photo by Chuck Dearborn)

DEFENDERS OF THE CORPORATE STATE

Neither of these liberals want to see the formation and/or continued growth of an open, avowed American left. Both of them are interested primarily in the Democratic Party. They want our imperialist empire retained, but it can be done cosmetically. Neither of them are a significant challenge to the system, whether it be American foreign policy in general or domestic social change. They have very little long range relevancy to the problems of living in a Cold War America.

These men perceive, quite correctly, that in the long run China will not let the U.S. government subdue Vietnam militarily. They see that L.B.J. & Co. Inc. may even extend the bombing and fall their air bases to the Asian mud, so they want to get out of such a losing proposition. The American ruling would be a different story altogether, for south of our border there is no bulwark against the North American colossus. There, the U.S. Government would have a better chance of "winning" against revolutionary socialism and other forms of radical change.

Some will say my arguments are impractical, idealistic. But the strategy of a seat in Congress by, for example, Mr. Porter does not map the way to the building of mass militancy towards electing these kind of liberals every two years, we'll all be dead before there's even two dozen of them in Congress. Only public opinion or military defeat can stop this war, and liberal electoral politics. When the war becomes bigger and expensive and difficult, the regular politicians will pull out of Vietnam, if only to avoid the formation of a strong American "peace party" vote built on the issue, so let's not waste our meager resources on such games.

Let's put our energy into the small tangible things that help build a left-wing movement--direct action and educational projects, etc. Leftists too often end up as tools of the Democratic Party. If we dabble in electoral politics at all, it should only be for left-wing and independent candidates.

That's my slanted argument against liberals like Porter, Morgan, Wayne Kennedy, Jr. Kennedy, et al. They don't want to stop the Cold War; they want to use the Cold War to reform the system so as to avoid changing it. It's a family feud over the tactics of arms, and reformist liberalism is the ideological bulwark of that empire.

SOME OTHER PEOPLE

Let's consider the comments of two working people who are opposed to the war. The first person, who is moderately opposed, asked me if I was pushing Porter. I said no. He said, well, a Porter win wouldn't change anything, I said yeah that's right. I was heartened to hear that a Eugene resident had a more sophisticated analysis of the primaries than did the academic community.

The second person is strongly opposed to the war. She asked me "Did you vote?" I said, "no." She frowned and said "Better did I...I saw Morgan on T.V.--my husband and I both voted for him" (just didn't vote). He seemed to be kind of like he was above us, kind of like a snob...." I said, "Yeah, that's it, the whole thing."

I am not, in taking note of these two people, trying to idealize the working class. But I am suggesting that Morgan and Porter appeal to a certain identifiable social and economic class attitude. That little constituency in Harris Hall for Morgan--that was no community gathering. It was made up by and for someone there who looked average. These were not the people whose sons would probably come back from Vietnam in coffins. These were the national bourgeoisie who have an investment (psychologically and/or otherwise) in the status quo, and they were worried that perhaps their fellow anti-Communist liberals in the Capitol Hill swamp would "lose" Vietnam and subjugate not only the American G.I. into a war with China but also themselves, the national bourgeoisie.

Minneapolis Community Union Project

1. Staff. The project staff now numbers 10 people representing varying levels of involvement, all living in Phillips neighborhood and working on the project at least part-time. A few people have commitments such as summer school which limit their involvement.

2. Tot Lot. The MCUP has assumed full responsibility for the development, maintenance and programming of a vacant lot (playground) owned by Waite Neighborhood House. The lot has received over the the project house, has been cleaned up (the boulders and glass are gone, at least) and now must be fenced, covered with topsoil and some play equipment located on it. Funds are requested to get the job done around ready. It is needed now! School got out last week and the kids are anxious to get the playground built. We estimate the cost per lot for developing the lot, including equipment, to be about $50.00. Once the playground is functioning, some of the staff members: Sue Sternfels, e.g., will spend some time working with the kids. Our project that will start soon, a demand of the kids around here, is the construction of a fort. We have committed ourselves to providing the lumber and materials. Construction of this edifice will require a little supervision by project staff just to prevent broken heads.

3. Orientation Session. Bob Shibboleth and Bert Stack from JOIN will arrive from Chicago on June 20 to help us conduct a staff orientation and training session. We have agreed to pay travel expenses for both (if they both come) and the staff pays for about a week. This session will focus around very basic techniques and strategies for the project staff and will, hopefully, place us all at the same relative level of ignorance. Funds, roughly in the amount of $100, are needed to underwrite this.

4. Organizing. Pending availability of funds soon, the project needs to acquire an office model typewriter, a mimeo machine, a file cabinet, some professional quality posters (any one will donate his time if we provide pictures and pay for the materials) and some buttons. One question then, we must incur is the cost of making a fundraising appeal. We are prevented from making any large solicitation because we can't afford postage stamps, envelopes, etc. The project will also begin to look for an office soon, perhaps on Franklin Ave., to use as project headquarters. The place at 2535 13 Ave. is not an outstanding location, for organizing purposes anyway, and our tenancy is less than secure. Sometime in the near future, we will need some firm commitments of on-going financial support, maybe through a pledge campaign, to insure having rent and utilities paid for the office.

5. FUNDS!!! All of the above activities are predicated on some successful fund-raising efforts IMMEDIATELY! We need $150.00 by this coming Sunday, for instance. Actually, we should have the lot levelled and the sand on it before the onset of rains, in effect, to get underway. Hit your friends, relatives, co-workers; people on the street; etc. (we've got grey polishing pencils at Franklin & Bloomington now).

Form Draft Committee

The formation of an informal committee to study the possibilities of local-scale national anti-draft programs, and hopefully present some result to the conventions, was announced at the NC Sunday night. Members so far are Paul Lauter in Chicago, John Wilhelm of Yale, John Bennett of Seattle, Norm Earl Silbar of Roosevelt, Steve Weissman of Berkeley, Jared Israel of Harvard, Don Olsen of the printing office, Rich Berkowitz of U. of Illinois Chicago, and Mark Kleiman in L.A. The committee is being coordinated by, and interested people (with ideas or affiliations) should contact Brent Kramer, c/o Friedman, 5320 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60615.

We are working from some of the preliminary proposals formulated before and during the NC (such as Paul Lauter's in the May 20 NLN), trying to be more realistic and more definite about them as the conference can receive some really potent ideas.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED

by Tom Condit

The June issue of New Guard (magazine of the Young Americans for Freedom, 1211 Mass. Ave. NW, Washington, D.C., 20005, 14 pp.) has the standard dull fare ("exposes" of SNCC, Collectivism for Peace, etc.) except this: an interview with a conservative student leader at Cal, etc.), livened up by a laudatory article on Marvel Cosimo as a bastion of pro-capitalist propaganda and an article on the fascist Front to Liberate Vietnam which totally misses the point about totalitarian liberation. There is also a review of The New Left, by Phillip Abbott Luce, another radical spy who now writes "true confessions" about his former sins in the radical movement.

The May issue of The Activist (21-1/2 W. College, Oberlin, Ohio 44074, 16 pp.) contains Raya Dunayevskaya's The New Left in Japan, a history of the Zengakuren and the new working-class radicals. There are also reports on the Berkeley campaign, the ADA convention, the coup in Ghana, white power in Rhodesia and the "trickle down theory of civil rights."

The June 6 Bulletin of International Socialism (339 Lafayette St., NYC, 10012, 8 per year; 25 cents for each issue) contains articles on the draft and the 2-5 deferment, independent political action, and the New York social workers' strike.

The March-April Studies on the Left (260 West Broadway, rm. 202, NYC 10013, 10 per year) has articles on community organizing and the working class in Cuba. Joseph Conlin's review of Gabriel Kolko's book The Industrial Workers of the World, 1905-1919 effectively exposes that widely-"revolutionary industrial unionism" was not a variant of European "anarcho-syndicalism" but was a distinctly American and much more radical approach to social change.

QUESTIONS ARONOWITZ

To the Editor:

It is unfortunate that Stanley Aronowitz's article (NLN, June 10th) appeared at this time. The announcement of the forming of a new friend of SDS--known for his own union activities--will be the real effect of assuring those who have just made the smallest of beginnings, as well as those who are contemplating a beginning, to stop and wonder if they are choosing to work in a potentially fruitful area.

Aronowitz raises his questions in a historical setting, and it is interesting that he directs the major part of this article to the CIO period, 1935-45 (the 20 years since 1945 receive a scant 1-3 lines). In doing so he feeds upon the largely unhistorical romanticization natives which people have about the CIO. Largely ignored is today's labor movement, the realities of today's labor movement are not the realities of the CIO of the mid-1930's and 40's. They are rooted in the cold war decade 1945-55. People waiting to understand today's labor movement and any possibilities it might offer for social change should not ignore the CIO but they would do infinitely better to study the history of the labor movement since/after and of the second World War. This period is not nearly as glamourous or as dynamic as the CIO but it does offer a much better understanding to those wanting to work in today.

4th St., NYC 10009; 17 per year) contains an article on the role of the Jet Corps as a bulwark of the status quo.

The National Guardian Committee, New Zealand Committees on Vietnam, puts out an excellent one-shot entitled Bulletin #13 (Boundary Rd., Wellington 1, N.Z.), which reprints relevant material on the war. The April 8 issue contains an exchange of letters between the Whangarei Committee on Vietnam and Prime Minister Holyoake which is of interest to Americans because of its openness. Not only is the P.M. willing to engage in a direct reply to the Whangarei telegram rather than a form letter, but it contains a reasoned factual (if incorrect) defense of the government's policy rather than an hysterical attack. Perhaps the traditions of democracy are more deeply entrenched in New Zealand than here.

The June Industrial Worker (2422 N. Halsted, Chicago, Ill. 60614; 11 a year) contains articles on the Chicago housing struggle, strike and on Swedish reactions to the recent congress of the Labor and Socialist International.

Steven Kelman, the activist terrible of old New Liberalism, has an interesting discussion of "The Feud Among the Radicals" in the June issue of Commentary. Unfortunately, Kelman lays out a fair presentation of the issues of dispute.

The Student Union for Peace Action (658 Spadina Ave., Toronto 4, Ontario, Canada) has published a guide for Americans wishing to emigrate to Canada, whether to avoid the draft or for other reasons. ("Coming to Canada?", 25 cents).

Two new reprints from Liberation (5 Beekman St., NYC 10038) are "Conscription and Draft", by Stewart Meacham and "A Visit to Saigon" by A. J. Muste (10 cents each). Still available are "Let Us Break Bread Together" by Carl Oglesby (10 cents), American Atrocities in Vietnam" by Eric Norden (25 cents), "Nuclear Victims not Executioners" by Albert Camus (25 cents), and "The Triple Revolution" (10 cents).

The May-June issue of Iran Report (P.O. Box 232, Cambridge, Mass. 02138, 10 per year) contains articles on military justice in Iran, the renewed offensive of the Islamic Clergy, and a brief summary of the Iranian Studies at the University of Maryland (with a summary of the more important papers).

N.O. Needs Money

It costs $3,000 a month to maintain the base, program and administration of the Student Nonviolent Coalition. We are taking in (on the average) $750 a month. We would like to ask members who have anything above subsistance paying jobs this summer to pledge 1% of their income to National SDS. We would then be able to build for fall programs and maintain the needed staff workers. All too often it is left to 2% of the organization to face such responsibilities. If many of the membership felt this responsibility we could ensure the continued functioning of National SDS this summer.

I promise to make a monthly pledge of to National SDS.

Resolution on Ghana

ED. NOTE: The following petition was adopted by the NC. I included the motion and the amendment which were passed impliminting action.

SDS takes note of the situation in Ghana at present, where certain political refugees are virtually arrested and have been imprisoned by the leaders of the military government and are threatened with deportation to their native countries to face probable execution. SDS deplores this situation and declares itself in agreement with those standards of international conduct which would hold political refugees should have the right to choose their next destination should they face extradition.

Amendment: SDS will distribute copies of this petition to all its chapters and encourage their further distribution by the chapters.

Petition on Ghana

APPEAL TO THE GHANAIAN GOVERNMENT FOR

THE LIBERATION OF THE CAMEROUNIAN REFUGEES

In Accra, Ghana, since several days after the military coup last February, some African political refugees were welcomed in Ghana) have been held in prison.

Those men, who are the leaders of the U.P.C. (Cameroun Peoples Union), Jean-Martin TCHAPTCHET and Michel N'DOH, are threatened with death in their native country, whose press has announced blatantly that they run the risk of execution if they are extradited to Ghana.

According to the standards of conduct set up by the International Convention of Geneva on the right of political asylum, refugees still in detention in Accra should be provided with the opportunity to choose their next destination should they face expulsion. Also, simple humanity, as well as the concern of defending men who fought for justice (as they conceived it), requires that TCHAPTCHET and N'DOH be permitted to leave Accra and that they have the right to go to a country of their choice. They should not be permitted to remain any longer in the prisons of Accra, nor should they be delivered up to a government which wishes their death.

We take the liberty of requesting you to sign this appeal on behalf of the Camerounian refugees, returning it to:
